vaccinator to vaccinate on an average at the very least 10 cases a day. All the 2,500 unprotected cases therefore can be vaccinated by the present vaccinator himself within less than one-year - after making due allowance for additions to the unprotected list consequent on births that occur during the period. The real difficulty is not by any means so much the inadequacy of the staff as the disinclination of the people to get the children vaccinated when the vaccinator actually arrives at the village. In the face of the obvious popular apathy no object would be served by merely augmenting the existing staff. If satisfactory progress of work is to be ensured the Malnad Improvement Committee must devise efficient means whereby unprotected cases could be made readily available for vaccination. Next to compulsory vaccination, the best way would perhaps be to specifically fix the responsibilities of the Patel, firstly, in making out a correct list of unprotected children in his village and secondly, to keep the cases ready for vaccination on the date of which previous intimation reaches him through takids sent from the Amildar's office.
